Holkars and Architecture

When we think of Indore, the first thing that crosses our mind is the famous Holkar Dynasty. Not only did the widowed queen of Khanda Rao Holkar, Ahilya Bai reform the orthodox beliefs of the Indian society, she is also considered as the fountain head of Architecture of the Holkar State. The development of architecture during the reign of Ahilya Bai was extravagant. The forts constructed during the Mughal rule was an inspiration for the Holkars. The similarity between the two can be observed by looking at various architectural masterpieces such as the Rajwada palace and The Lalbagh palace of Indore.

The Rajwada Palace

Having been built approximately 200 years ago by the Holkars, this majestic palace is located amidst the famous Kagan Market in Indore. This seven-storied structure is located near the Chattris, and serves as an excellent example of royal grandeur and architectural skills. Located between the crowded streets of the Kagan Bazaar and facing the main square of the city, The Rajwada palace also faces a well-maintained garden that houses a statue of Queen Ahilya Bai, an artificial waterfall and some beautiful fountains. Even after all these years, the palace continues to be one of the most famous tourist spots in Indore and is one of the oldest structures too.
